

The Regulations will have a variety of far reaching implications:

- (a) It will bring harmony in regulations of venture capital funds, private equity funds, etc;
- (b) It will enable several variety of funds that were not possible in the past – for example, social capital funds, or real estate funds, or hedge funds for that matter; and
- (c) It will possibly give SEBI some more space for regulating the nearly-illicit schemes where money is collected from investors with tall talks of making fanciful returns – ultimately someone packs up everything and vanishes.

The Regulations are generally speaking very flexible, and amount to a very modest regulation. The AIF Regulations only lay down the standards as to how the corpus of the AIF (being different for different categories of AIF) shall be invested. The AIF Regulations do not monitor the investments made by the AIF such as monitoring the selection criteria of investee companies, time of investment, pricing, etc. For example:

- (a) No basis for determination of price per unit of an AIF has been set;
- (b) No eligibility criteria for an investor in an AIF has been laid down, i.e. whether it is impertinent for the investor to be a high net worth person, even though practically that may be the case;
- (c) No requirement to register the manager of an AIF. An investment advisor is not a mandatory requirement.

Defining Features of an AIF

Note that the stance of the AIF Regulations is regulatory and prohibitive – no AIF can carry on the business of an AIF in India without being registered with SEBI. Therefore, while the AIF Regulations bring legitimacy and regulatory approval for collective investment devices, at the same time, they proscribe any form of an unregistered collective investment vehicle. Therefore, it becomes important to understand what exactly the scope of coverage of the AIF Regulations is.

While AIFs are defined in Regulation 2(1)(b)¹ of the AIF Regulations, it is unclear on the characteristics which make a vehicle an AIF. However, from the language of the AIF Regulations, and with a bit of intuition, the following defining features of an AIF may be deduced:

- (a) It is an investment vehicle. The idea of the vehicle should be investment of money and not ownership of property, carrying on of a business or activity other than investment activity, such as charity, public welfare schemes, etc. The essential meaning of “investment” is outlay of money with an objective of generating a rate of return, other than by carrying on a substantive activity. For example, buying land, carrying out construction thereon and then selling apartments is not an investment activity, but buying a property and holding it for the purpose of capital appreciation is an investment activity. Lot of contrived confusions may arise as to whether NGOs, social welfare funds, etc. are covered by the AIF Regulations. We take up a few:
 - (i) Two or more persons pool money to own a property. Their purpose is not investment of money – that is, realise returns from the property, but to beneficially enjoy the property. This is not an AIF.
 - (ii) Two or more persons pool money to run a business, other than investment business. This is certainly not covered by the AIF Regulations.
 - (iii) A trust set up in India receives contributions either domestically or from non-residents, to be spent on charity, social welfare schemes, etc. This is certainly not covered by the AIF Regulations.
- (b) There is segregation between ownership of money and management of money. The essential idea of the AIF Regulations is investors handing over their money to be managed by a fund manager. If the beneficiaries are managing their own money, even though under a collective banner, there is no AIF.

A defining feature of an AIF is that it is an investment vehicle. The idea of the vehicle should be investment of money and not ownership of property, carrying on of a business or activity other than investment activity, such as charity, public welfare schemes, etc.

An AIF is a collective vehicle. Central to the concept of AIFs under the AIF Regulations is the “pooling” of money. That is to say, once money is commingled into a common fund, the assets held by the fund cannot be identified against any particular investor. In other words, it is a commingled pool of money that collectively makes investment.

- (c) The contributions are pooled not in form of ownership capital. For example, every company does essentially pool shareholders’ funds. But every company cannot be called an AIF. So, a company will become an AIF only where the company pools money from persons other than its own shareholders. Even money pooled by issue of bonds or debentures cannot be said to be pooling of money. In the same manner, if an LLP invites capital from its own partners, such pooling of money is not covered by the AIF Regulations. Sometimes, there may be questions about whether issue of bonds by a trust may result into a collective investment device – the prima facie answer should be no, as the returns on the bonds are not based on performance of the pooled fund. The answer, however, may be different if the instrument is labelled as a bond, but it effectively transfers the returns generated from the pooled funds by linking the bond returns to pool returns.
- (d) It is a managed vehicle. The AIF Regulations, unfortunately, are very clear on this issue, but this may be a very contentious point. The idea of collective investment devices is that a group of persons provide funds to be “managed” by a manager. The meaning of “managing” is that the manager uses discretion in allocating the funds into investments, and often makes investment decisions, disinvestment decisions, and so on. Whether or not the fund is actively managed, and whether the fund makes a schematic investment or goes by a formula are different questions, but the idea of “managing” is an element of discretion on the manager. A merely co-ownership device or non-discretionary passive investments will not be said to be AIFs under the AIF Regulations.
- (e) It is a collective vehicle. Central to the concept of AIFs under the AIF Regulations is the “pooling” of money. That is to say, once money is commingled into a common fund, the assets held by the fund cannot be identified against any particular investor. In other words, it is a commingled pool of money that collectively makes investment.
- (f) It is a private vehicle. Post these AIF Regulations, one understands that, that borderline of distinction between collective investment schemes covered by the SEBI (Collective Investment Schemes) Regulations, 1999, and the AIF Regulations will be that the former may invite public subscriptions, while the latter may only privately source their money. The number of investors may be large – as many as 1000. It is a curious question as to what is private placement. In the history of corporate India, the practice of inviting subscriptions from thousands of investors, and still calling it private placement, used to exist several years ago – which prompted a proviso to be inserted in Section 67 (2) of the Companies Act to provide that subscriptions from more than 50 persons will be deemed to be a public offer. The generic meaning of private placement will be taken on the same lines as in Section 67 of the Companies Act – something that is not calculated to result into an invitation to subscribe being available to a person other than the one to whom the issuer makes. That is, as long as the AIF makes an offer, and the offer may be accepted only by the person to whom it is made, it is a private placement. Obviously, no public advertisement, circular or marketing literature may be circulated for a private placement.
- (g) It must have a certain constitutional form – that is, a company, body corporate, LLP, or trust. The Category I AIFs are those that invest in start-ups or early stage ventures, SMEs or infrastructure or sectors or areas which are considered socially and economically relevant for the country. The idea clearly seems to be that the Category I AIF shall have a developmental focus rather than pure commercial motive.

definition is not correctly worded – the way the definition reads, it amounts to saying that an AIF is an AIF only if it is a company, a body corporate, an LLP or a trust. For instance, if an individual raises funds to be pooled and collectively managed, it is possible to contend that this is not covered by the AIF Regulations. Such a view defeats the purpose of the AIF Regulations, but unfortunately, this is how the language is worded. Another significant point is the erroneous use of language “established in form of a trust”. Securities regulations have consistently been misunderstanding the notion of a trust – a trust is not “established”. It is quite common for people to have a wrong notion that a trust is formed by signing a trust deed or by registering a trust. Trust is not a form of organisation – hence, question of establishing a trust does not arise at all. Trust is the name of relation between a fiduciary and a beneficiary. If property is transferred to a fiduciary, to be held for the benefit of beneficiaries, that holding of property with an obligation attached to it is what is called a trust. In that sense, every AIF, irrespective of whether it is a company, or LLP, or any other body corporate, is a trust – since in addition to ownership capital, such entity will pool money which it holds on behalf of the unit holders.

- (h) There is no de minimis exemption based on the number of investors. Notably, even the US Dodd Frank Act provides exemptions for vehicles that pool money from small number of investors - 14 in the case of Dodd Frank. The AIF Regulations do not contain any exemption – so, technically, even if money is held on behalf of two or more persons, to be invested, there will be an AIF. Of course, money held on behalf of a single investor cannot be said to be an AIF at all, as there is no pooling there. This, however, may be considered as a restriction to carry on an activity of an AIF without registering the AIF with SEBI.
- (i) There is no de minimis exemption based on the size of investment. In other words, irrespective of how small a fund is, it will still incur the prohibition of the AIF Regulations. Note that the AIF Regulations lay down minimum sizes – ₹20 crore for each scheme. But that does not mean where the size of the fund is less than ₹20 crore, it does not require registration².

Figure 1 shows the decision-criteria in terms of a flow-chart as to whether a vehicle will be taken as an AIF. Note that if the vehicle in question is taken to be an AIF, it has to mandatorily register with SEBI and has to comply with all the Regulations.

The Three Categories of AIFs

The theme that runs across the AIF Regulations is the three different types of AIFs. This seems to be quite a

² Regulation 3 of the AIF Regulations makes it clear that no fund can privately pool investment unless registered as an AIF under the AIF Regulation. Regulation 3 reads as “no entity or person shall act as an Alternative Investment Fund unless it has obtained a certificate of registration from the Board:.....”.
